Every day, all over the world, USAID brings hope to those who suffer from violence, health to those who struggle with sickness, and support to those who live in poverty. It is these individuals—these uncounted millions of lives—that are the true measure of USAID's success and the true face of America's foreign assistance programs. The Telling Our Story project seeks to document these successes by spotlighting their lives.

Through anecdotes, photos and facts, USAID's Telling Our Story creates a record of how the American people assist individuals, families and communities. USAID overseas missions and their partners submit stories about their work online, which are then converted into ready-to-use publications and other online resources. The publications' simple design and clear language make them versatile communications tools that share America's successes with a global audience.

For more information, please contact Telling Our Story at tosinquiries@usaid.gov or visit www.usaid.gov/stories.

“ We will stay dry when the rains come. We can lock up our things, and most of all our family can have some privacy. It's a real home... Thanks, America. ”

TSUNAMI HOMES

Since the tsunami swept away his home, Sri Lankan fisherman B. Disannayake has struggled to keep his family together while living in a hot, wet tent. But in March 2005, they were able to regain some normalcy by moving into a new home. On the foundation of his old house, USAID built a 200-square-foot transitional shelter. USAID is building more than 10,000 shelters in Sri Lanka, and people like Disannayake can earn a month's wages by helping with construction.

HELP FOR THE HANDICAPPED

Elisabeth Nassalan, wife and mother of six, was harvesting mangoes when she lost her legs to a landmine in 2001. But now Elisabeth has hope for a brighter future. With help from USAID, she opened a small shop in her house that allows her to support her family.

USAID has assisted handicapped people in Senegal since 1999, helping them integrate into society and providing prosthetics, transportation, education, training and start-up funding for alternative forms of income, like Elisabeth's home kiosk.

USAID is also supporting a landmine awareness campaign that has reached 400,000 people.

“Now, even though I am alone, I am able to earn money and care for my children. The assistance I have received has helped me greatly in making a fresh start.”

CAMEL BUSINESS

The Bactrian camel was once the symbol of Mongolia, providing rural herders like Ikhbayar with not only a hardy method of transportation, but also dung for fires, milk, meat and wool. But its numbers have steadily declined as rural dwellers move into cities for better income.

USAID is helping strengthen Mongolia's rural businesses through diversification and new market opportunities. Local cooperatives were formed to help herders identify and secure sources of raw materials, and families were shown marketing techniques that will boost their income. Ikhbayar now markets dairy products in a nearby town, and his wife is experimenting with new processing techniques she learned at a training.

“We have been able to increase our income with the training.”

Ikhbayar

Ikhbayar, a Gobi camel herdsman, joined a cooperative with 18 other herder families, who work together on cashmere classification, animal breeding and dairy production.

CHILDREN'S EDUCATION

Dancing and smiling schoolchildren from all over Conakry, Guinea, animated a ceremony where USAID handed out over 500,000 new textbooks for primary students across the country. In a country where only 41 percent of adults can read, and where children—girls in particular—face daunting barriers to schooling, strengthening the educational system is essential to development. USAID is also offering a scholarship program to encourage girls to complete primary school and is training teachers to improve the quality of education they'll receive when they get there.

Three girls hold language arts textbooks produced through the USAID-supported Africa Education Initiative.

GRASSROOTS DEMOCRACY

Dire economic conditions, a lack of security and a history of government corruption are realities of life in the West Bank and Gaza, making the practice of democracy particularly challenging. USAID has provided $16 million in grants to Palestinian organizations to promote democracy and set the stage for a free and fair electoral process.

For the January 2005 presidential elections, USAID trained community leaders, who then recruited and organized hundreds of election observers. This grassroots participation gave Palestinians a sense of ownership over the vote and is helping them become neutral watchdogs over their emerging democratic process.

SMART FORESTS

Furniture retailers are increasingly purchasing timber solely from certified well-managed forests, yet only 0.5 percent of all forests meet that requirement. To help Bolivia comply with international standards so that loggers and indigenous communities can profit from the timber trade, USAID helped foresters develop ecologically and economically sustainable practices that limit soil and water degradation while protecting biological diversity. Thanks to the way the country manages its forests, Bolivia is now home to almost 8 percent of the world's eco-certified forests, and in one year's time, its exports of certified products increased fivefold.

SMALL LOANS

Madame Fanfan used to sell rice on the side of the road to support herself and her family and worried every day whether she would be able to feed her five children. But after receiving a small loan from USAID, she was able to purchase a stall in a prime location in the market and has diversified her wares beyond rice to include flour, coffee, oil and other products.

USAID provides small loans and other financial services to the poorest Haitian women so they can create or improve their own small businesses. In December 2004, a $400,000 increase in capital allowed the program to increase its outreach to women like Madame Fanfan by more than 35 percent.

Madame Fanfan says she no longer worries about whether her children will be able to eat every day.

A BABY'S HEARTBEAT

Kosovo has one of the highest infant mortality rates in Europe at 35 deaths per 1,000 births. USAID is helping reduce those numbers by supporting careful monitoring and prenatal care. USAID donated a fetal Doppler heart monitor to one clinic, allowing Dr. Tole Frrenaj, who is pregnant with her third child, to monitor unborn babies' heart rates. Now, in addition to routine pregnancy exams, Tole can monitor changes to the baby's development—all during the very early stages of pregnancy.

“Listening to your baby's heartbeats in the initial weeks of your pregnancy is the same as listening to the first cry of your newborn.”

AN ALTERNATIVE CROP

Uganda's uplands are officially the home of coffee farms, but bad harvests and depressed markets had reduced coffee's practicality for producers. Based on studies it funded in the 1990s, USAID developed several varieties of rice well suited to the upland conditions, then trained farmers how to cultivate them. In 2003, Uganda produced 110 tons of upland rice; by early 2004, production rose to 275 tons. The new rice strains can be grown outside flooded rice paddies, which undermine wetland conservation and require farmers to work in pest- and disease-ridden swamps.

CLEAN WATER

After the Soviet Union collapsed, so too did the infrastructure of Jar-Kyshtak, an Uzbek-Kyrgyz border town. Its 2,400 residents only had access to contaminated water, causing hepatitis A and typhoid outbreaks. Ethnic tensions flared, splitting the border village in two. USAID worked with the cross-border communities to improve infrastructure and open lines of communication. Over five months, the entire village—more than 400 families—reconstructed its water system and dug 30 new wells. Although the local Uzbek government at first was reluctant, the Kyrgyz residents invited all 160 Uzbek citizens to freely use the fresh water from its new wells.

“We are all parents. We all want our children to stay healthy. [Water] is our life.”

BUSINESS SCHOOL

Georgia's economic transition has been a painful process. It needed top business graduates to help, but in the late 1990s, not one MBA program was offered in the country. In 2001, USAID helped establish the Caucasus School of Business, which is now a highly regarded, self-sustaining institution. The school offers four degree concentrations, and its graduates fill the ranks of Georgia's most successful businesses.
